

Cable companies should allow other ISPs on their cable networks as the Bells presently do, but only after the cable companies are allowed to recover the cost of the cable infrastructure first as the Bells were allowed to do with their wire infrastructure. Not to do so would clearly create a disincentive for any company to deploy an infrastructure unless its costs could be recovered through operations or through amortization.